

The best opportunities can be found in times of crisis.

Before I tell you about my story and what I learned from the experience, I would like to explain the context. I was serving in the military in April 2021. And in the meantime, the troops had to go to what was called "Bulmogi" Operation, and unfortunately, our company was put into the operation. (The "Bulmogi" operation is to go to the DMZ to detect landmines, remove them, and remove all the bushes there.) I was really nervous and scared because it was a very dangerous operation that could step on landmines.

Almost all of my colleagues and I were put into action, and everyone was afraid to go there. When I actually went and conducted the operation, the weather was quite hot and the environment was poor. In fact, hand grenades and land mines came out, and I was worried that I might have stepped on them by mistake. I teamed up with my colleagues in the operation and proceeded with the work.

Unfortunately, at the time, I didn't know that The importance of cooperation with colleagues. I tried to solve everything by myself, and I was selfish. So I suffered a little at the time. What I learned from this experience is, of course, that I can produce some decent results on my own, but the results I achieved in cooperation with my colleagues are better. Of course, it is still lacking a lot, but I respect my colleagues more than before and try to move in the direction of working together as much as possible.
